Question: 1 (reference to Context)

Reference :-

These lines have been taken from the sonnet "Ozymandias" by P.B. Shelley.

Context:- "Ozymandias" is an ironical poem.

The reference is made to the Egyptian pharaoh Ramises II. We learn that a man with such will and power can not escape death. His statue bears more a lesson for the people than his glory.

Explanation:- These lines throw light on the sculptor instead of the sculpture. Shelley believes that John Keats that life is short and art is long. Here Shelley admires those hands which carved and created the statue. The sculptor engraved in stone more of his heart than his face. Centuries have passed but the beautiful artistic expression is still alive which portrays the cruelty and arrogance of the king. They are still present today. Here art is the source of eternity. Art is immortal; the beauty it holds is never-ending no matter what. Due to the art the life may come to end but the significance of it will always last but yet even art has to perish one day.

Question: 2 (Story)

Sometimes, we come across people who claim to be faithful and loyal but they turn out to be fair-weather friends. Such people don't care for one's feeling and leave them in the darkness in the time of need.

Once, there lived two very close friends in a village. They had promised to stand by each other in the time of need. They had excelled in skills and decided to try for opportunity in another town to reach the other town they had to pass through the jungle as they were walking continuously they had reached to the dense part of the jungle as they were passing they saw a figure approaching them as it started to get closer it was none other than a huge bear. One of the friend knew how to climb the tree, he did not care about a single thing and hurriedly climbed the tree, while the other poor friend had no idea what to do, he quickly laid down and held his breath, pretending to be dead. The bear approached him look all over and sniffed after some moment he left and the friend got down from the tree and asked his friend that "What did the bear say in your ear?" the friend replies "The bear advised me to beware of selfish friends".

Moral :- "A friend in need is a friend indeed"
